THREE OWLS AND A BAYONET

In the same week – three owls and a bayonet. The snowy owls on fence and field, their ghostly plumage easy to spot in this snowless winter. The bayonet in the middle of a road, as though shucked from a soldier's rifle that day, when it really belonged in the first world war.

Tempting to make something in a symbol – the owls good luck, the bayonet bad. Or the opposite – the owls messengers from beyond the grave, the bayonet about keeping boundaries. This is how we make our stories and our lives, from what appears before us, from what we find by accident. We are made up of history and nature; of the past that is built on top of a past we cannot see; of the lake and woods and sky that surround our town. Who we are is altered and added to every day, by what we notice and what we discover, and by the story we shape to tell about it.

--January 1, 2015